

ALEIX RIERA

COMPOSER AND PIANIST

Music's spiritual significance is when you truly feel music comes straight from a composer's heart, or a place where you think you will remain. When these things come true, music has let your spirit enter, live, and feel the path it was made to follow. That gives music's significance. A composer is similar to an architect. They make the place, the space, and even the time in order for a concrete message to be enclosed.

Music can also carry out a kind of spiritual experience, which does not have to agree with the listener, who actually feels and builds his own world inside that place, space, and time. For me, more than significance, music contributes a complete spiritual experience. While our culture, society, and way of life tend to make us forget our own spiritual needs; music always creates a path to allow our soul to listen, to see, to feel, and to communicate. This is true whether you are being the architect (composer) or the feelings builder (listener).
